Featured Artist: Chuck Keller

Chuck Keller's ink paintings incorporate characteristics of what has been termed "formline" art, the art of the indigenous people of the Pacific Northwest Coast. This decorative and representational art is defined by very strong traditions including a limited color palette, a varying degree of realism sometimes approaching abstraction, and incorporation of specific design elements including continually tapering and turning formlines, distinctive ovoid shapes, "U" shapes, and characteristic eye structures, to name a few. He finds that formline art offers many opportunities and challenges in creating balanced, visually pleasing compositions.

As Chuck says, "I do not represent my paintings (or myself) as "Native American". My work sometimes contains trees, flowers, rocks, or other objects seldom, if ever found in the traditional art, which generally depicted clan crest symbols or spirit beings, promoting awareness and appreciation of this unique art form and the First Nations cultures in which it was developed."
